It's late.
The kids are finally in their rooms.
The house goes quiet.
Your head doesn't.

BEFORE YOU START

A note before you start

A few years ago my wife asked me what we'd decided about a vendor contract. I spent twenty minutes digging through email, texts and a stack of notes, and came back with nothing useful.

That same month I missed one of my kids' school deadlines. Research I'd saved on a Sunday was gone by Friday. None of it was a disaster. All of it added up.

I run the business side of my wife's dental practice, and we have two teenagers. Like you, probably, I'm carrying a lot. I'd read Building a Second Brain and set it up properly. It fell apart around week six. I watched the YouTube videos, tried Notion, Obsidian and Evernote. Each system worked until it needed more care than I had left to give it.

So I stripped it down. One inbox. Three folders. A few minutes a day. It isn't clever, and that's the point. It holds the small stuff so my head doesn't have to.

This guide is that system. It takes about 30 minutes to set up. This is not a magic fix, but a product of my personal experience. After watching quite a number of productivity videos from people who are absolutely awesome at it, I realized that the shiny perfect picture they paint is for the same type of people they are: people with time to devote to perfecting systems and researching new ones. I belong to a different audience, the one with a spouse, two kids, a "few" other commitments and a plumber that's overdue. If I have 5 minutes a day to devote to something like this? Woohooo, let's go!

SECTION 1

Why your head is so loud

You know the feeling. It's late, the house is quiet, and your mind won't be.

Some of what's running through your head is big. Work, money, the kids, your marriage, and maybe the question nobody asks out loud: is this what this stage of life was supposed to feel like?

But a lot of it is small. Call the insurance company. Reply to that email. Find the receipt. Look into the thing you said you'd look into. Remember to ask about the deadline.

> Each small thing is light. Together they're heavy.

And here's the problem: your brain doesn't know the difference. It keeps rehearsing all of it, the big and the small, because it isn't sure you'll remember otherwise.

This is a load problem, not a character flaw

If you feel scattered, it's tempting to conclude you're slipping, or getting older, or just not as sharp as you used to be.

More likely you're carrying more open loops than any head was built to hold. A career, a household, kids, aging parents, a body that needs more maintenance than it used to. Nobody hands you a better memory at 45 to go with all that.

You don't need a better memory. You need somewhere to put things.

WHAT A SLEEP LAB FOUND

In 2018, researchers at Baylor University ran a small experiment. Fifty-seven people spent the night in a sleep lab. Before bed, half of them spent five minutes writing a to-do list for the next few days. The other half wrote about tasks they'd already finished.

MINUTES FASTER

to fall asleep, on average, for the people who wrote down what was still undone. The more specific the list, the faster they fell asleep.

The researchers' explanation is simple: when unfinished tasks are written down somewhere you trust, your mind can stop rehearsing them.

To be straight with you: it was one small study, the participants were college students, and it measured a single night. It doesn't prove anything about you. But it matches what I've seen in my own life, and it's the whole idea behind this guide in one experiment.

IT WILL

Get the small stuff out of your head and into one place you trust, in about 30 minutes, with a habit that takes a few minutes a day.

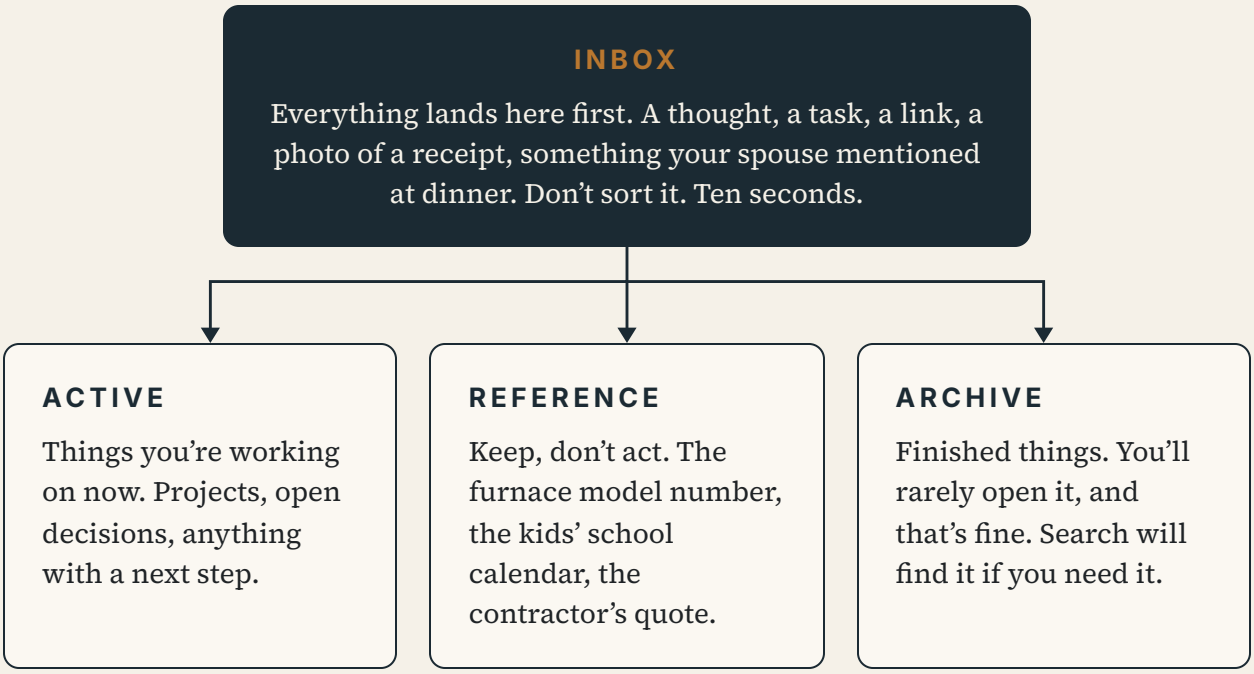

IT WON'T

Answer the bigger questions. No filing system can. What it can do is turn the noise down, so you can actually hear yourself think about them.

SECTION 2

The whole system on one page

Here’s everything. If you only read one page, read this one.

ALL DAY

Capture

The moment something lands in your head, put it in the Inbox.

EVERY EVENING

Empty

Five minutes. Move each item to Active, Reference, Archive, or the trash.

SUNDAY

Look

Fifteen minutes. Clear out Active. Notice what’s been sitting too long.

That’s the whole system. No tags to maintain, no dashboards, no color codes. If it ever starts to feel like a second job, you’ve added too much. Come back to this page.

SECTION 3

Pick your tool in two minutes

The best tool is the one already on your phone. Seriously. Most systems die in the gap between having a thought and opening the app, so the app has to be one tap away.

Answer one question: what phone do you carry?

IPHONE

Apple Notes

Free, already installed, syncs to your Mac or iPad, has folders and good search. This is what the setup below walks through.

ANDROID

Google Keep

Free, already on most Android phones. It uses labels instead of folders; make one label for each folder and it works the same way.

Only consider something else if:

- You already use Notion every day for work. Then use it. Make four pages instead of four folders.
- You want your notes stored as plain files on your own computer. Then use Obsidian. It's free to use; syncing between devices is optional and paid.

That's the whole decision. Don't research it. Don't watch a comparison video. The tool matters far less than the habit, and you can move your notes later if you ever need to.

SECTION 4

The 30-minute setup

Set a timer for 30 minutes. Sit somewhere you won't be interrupted. Have your phone in hand. The steps below use Apple Notes; the same steps work in any tool.

Step 1: Make the folders

5 MIN

Open Notes. Tap back to the folder list and create four folders: Inbox, Active, Reference and Archive.

That's it. Resist the urge to make subfolders. You can add them later if you truly need them. Most people never do.

Step 2: Make capture one tap away

5 MIN

Capture only works if it's faster than forgetting.

- Put Notes on your home screen, in the dock if you can.
- On iPhone: open Control Center and add Quick Note. One swipe, one tap, and you're writing. Quick Notes land in their own Quick Notes folder, not your Inbox. That's fine: treat Quick Notes as a second inbox and empty it in the evening along with the Inbox.
- On Android: add the Keep widget to your home screen and tap new note. In Keep, any note without a label is your Inbox.
- Otherwise, get in the habit of tapping into Inbox before you write.

Test it: capture "test" three times in a row. Each one should take under ten seconds.

Step 3: The first big empty

15 MIN

This is the part that matters most. Open your Inbox and write down everything that's currently living in your head. One item per note, or one long list, either works.

If you get stuck, go through these prompts:

- Work: decisions waiting on you, emails you owe, things you promised someone.
- Home: repairs, bills, appointments, things to buy, things to return.
- Family: school deadlines, birthdays, the conversation you keep meaning to have.
- Money: anything to check, cancel, move or look into.
- Health: appointments to book, refills, the thing you keep putting off.
- Someday: ideas, places, books, projects you'd like to get to.

Don't judge, don't organize, don't solve. Just write. Most people are surprised how long the list gets, and how much lighter they feel once it's out.

Step 4: First sort

5 MIN

Go through what you wrote and move each item:

- Something you need to act on → Active
- Something to keep but not act on → Reference
- Something already done, or that you've decided to drop → Archive or trash

Don't aim for perfect. Aim for an Inbox that's mostly empty. Anything you're unsure about can stay in the Inbox until tomorrow.

When the timer goes off, you're done. You now have a system.

SECTION 5

The daily habit

The system is three folders. The habit is what makes it work. It takes a few minutes a day, in two moments, plus one look a week.

During the day: capture

10 SEC

The moment something lands in your head, put it in the Inbox. A task, a thought, something someone asked you, a link, a photo of a whiteboard or a receipt.

> If it's worth remembering, it's worth ten seconds.

Don't trust yourself to remember it later. That's exactly the job you're taking off your brain.

In the evening: empty

5 MIN

Pick a time you'll actually keep. After the kids are in bed, after dinner, before you sit down for the night. Not in bed with the lights off; this works better as a deliberate few minutes than a last-second scramble.

1. Open the Inbox (and Quick Notes, on iPhone).
2. For each item, decide: Active, Reference, Archive, or trash.
3. Then open Active and write a short note for tomorrow: the three things still undone that matter most, as specifically as you can.

That last step is the sleep-lab idea in practice. You're telling your brain: it's written down, you can stop rehearsing it.

On Sunday: the weekly look

15 MIN

- Scroll through Active. Move anything finished to Archive.
- Notice what's been sitting in Active for weeks. Either take a next step, schedule it, or let it go to Archive. Letting go counts as a decision.
- Skim the week's notes. Anything you meant to act on and didn't?
- Write a short list for the week ahead.

Fifteen minutes, once a week. This is what keeps the system from quietly filling up and losing your trust.

SECTION 6

Your first week

The first week is about building the habit, not perfecting the system.

DAY 1

Do the 30-minute setup. Do your first evening empty tonight.

DAYS 2 TO 6

Capture at least three things a day. Empty the Inbox every evening, even if it takes two minutes.

DAY 7

Do your first weekly look. Then ask yourself one question: is my head any quieter than it was a week ago?

You'll know it's working when you catch yourself thinking "I should remember that," and instead of worrying about it, you reach for your phone, capture it, and forget about it. That moment is the whole point.

SECTION 7

When it slips

It will slip. Mine did, more than once. Here's what usually goes wrong and what to do about it.

You miss a few days.	Nothing breaks. Open the Inbox, empty it, and carry on. Don't start over, don't feel guilty. The system waits for you.
The Inbox piles up.	If it's past the point of a five-minute empty, declare a reset: move everything in the Inbox to Archive in one go, and start fresh tonight. Anything important will come back to you, and search will find the rest.
You start tinkering.	New folders, tags, color codes, a better app. This is the trap that killed every system I tried before this one. If you're spending more time on the system than in it, go back to Section 2 and strip it back down.
You want to switch tools.	Usually this is the tinkering trap in disguise. Give your current tool a full month before you change anything.
It feels like a chore.	Make it smaller. Capture only, and empty once a week instead of daily. A small habit you keep beats a perfect one you drop.

> A WORD ON SENSITIVE INFORMATION
> Don't keep passwords, full account numbers or medical records in plain notes. Use a password manager for passwords, and keep sensitive documents where they're properly protected. Your notes can say where something lives without holding the thing itself.

SECTION 8

Now that it’s quieter

I said at the start that this guide won’t answer the bigger questions, and it won’t.

But here’s what I’ve noticed in my own life. Once the small stuff has a place to go, the evenings get a little quieter. And in that quiet, the bigger questions are still there. They just stop being drowned out by the furnace filter and the permission slip.

What you do with that space is up to you. Maybe it’s a conversation you’ve been putting off. Maybe it’s an idea you’ve carried around for years. Maybe it’s just sitting on the porch without your mind running a checklist.

That’s what I write about every week: what it looks like to have the house, the career and the family, and still want to figure out the rest of it. If that sounds like you, I’d be glad to have you along.

APPENDIX

Three templates

Copy these into a note in your Reference folder so they're always one tap away.

Evening empty

5 MIN

- [ ] Open Inbox (and Quick Notes)
- [ ] Move each item: Active / Reference / Archive / trash
- [ ] Write tomorrow's three most important undone things, specifically
- [ ] Close the app

Weekly look

15 MIN, SUNDAY

- [ ] Move finished items from Active to Archive
- [ ] Decide on anything stuck for weeks: next step, schedule, or let go
- [ ] Skim the week's notes for anything missed
- [ ] Write a short list for the week ahead

The first big empty

ANY TIME YOUR HEAD FEELS FULL

WORK
decisions, emails owed, promises made

HOME
repairs, bills, appointments, buy, return

FAMILY
deadlines, birthdays, conversations to have

MONEY
check, cancel, move, look into

HEALTH
appointments, refills, things put off

SOMEDAY
ideas, places, books, projects

One inbox. Three folders. A few minutes a day.
